Files Court Action At Spencer

DES MOINES (AP) — The Iowa Water Pollution Control Commission has decided to file court action against the city of Spencer for allegedly failing to abate pollution of the Little Sioux River.

Commission Chairman Robert Buckmaster said Thursday the city was to have submitted plans for enlarging sewage treatment facilities by May 1, but failed to do so.

Spencer built a sewage treatment plant in 1960 under a state permit that specified the proportion of industrial waste to other waste could not be greater than five to one.

Red Cross Sets Sights On Long Range Program

As the need for emergency assistance nears an end in the area affected by last week's tornadoes, Red Cross disaster relief efforts are turning to the long-range recovery needs of the hundreds of families affected by the catastrophe.

According to Mrs. Charles Hutchison, chairman of the South Fayette County Red Cross Chapter, there are still weeks of hard work ahead for the Red Cross and for the stricken families of the ill-fated cities of Oelwein and Maynard.

Mrs. Hutchison emphasized that the Red Cross will remain on the job to help the more than 1100 families affected by the disaster in those cities.

"Our emergency assistance of supplying food, shelter, clothing and medical care is only the beginning," she said. "Now we take on the even bigger job of helping with the long-range needs of the victims so that they can resume their normal lives and places in the communities."

Mrs. Hutchison noted that this recovery assistance is approximately 75 per cent of all Red Cross disaster expenditures.

"Giving help to those who need it, is the job that the American Red Cross is on hand to do," she said. "If disaster victims have problems and needs they cannot handle themselves, we want them to come to disaster headquarters here in Oelwein. We have experienced Red Cross workers here to discuss individual problems and develop plans to get victims back on their feet by using their own resources and Red Cross help."
